The issue of recognition has been always a pivotal element of international and diplomatic relations. In that sense, the quest for international recognition can become complex and surrounded by numerous challenges. Nevertheless, numerous unrecognized or partially recognized polities present nowadays a claim to be considered a legitimate member of the so-called international community. Currently there are 9 polities in the world that are unrecognized or partially recognized which do not have any status in United Nations, plus 1 case, Palestine which is an observer member of the UN and is recognized by more than two thirds of its members.
