Zambia's farming revolution poster boy

Elleman Mumba makes an unlikely celebrity. He is neither a singer nor a footballer — he is a 54-year-old peasant farmer from southern Zambia. Yet he has appeared on the front page of a national newspaper and been interviewed for numerous radio and television programmes.

Mr Mumba grows (1) and groundnuts on his small plot of land in Shimabala, just south of Lusaka. Feeding his family used to be a problem. "The yield was very low. We were always looking for hand-outs; we had to rely on food relief."

Then, in 1997, Mr Mumba suddenly found himself in the vanguard of a quiet agricultural revolution. His wife had been given free training in a system called conservation farming, and persuaded him to try it. Conservation farming is about doing less to get more. Instead of ploughing entire fields, farmers till and plant in evenly spaced basins. This reduces erosion and run-off — where soil and nutrients are washed away by rain. "That season I had 68 bags of maize — enough to feed my family and buy four cattle," he says, blazing with pride at the recollection.

For big or small, the principles are the same: disturb the soil as (2) as possible, use natural processes as well as fertiliser to replenish its nutrients, leave crop residue in site rather than burning it off, and rotate crops.

Also called winterthorn or ana tree, this unusual acacia sheds its leaves just as the first rains fall. When mature, Mr Mumba's musangos will act as an organic fertiliser factory, and reduce his (3) on artificial inputs. Zambia's Conservation Farming Unit says the tree could play an important role in combating (4), both through planting programmes and by reducing the need for farmers to slash and burn new areas to access fertile soil.

Researchers say there is not enough empirical evidence to support the promotion of conservation farming as a magic bullet for sub-Saharan Africa's food shortfall. But several countries in the region are (5) its potential, hence the stream of visitors to Mr Mumba's door. They want to see if an average farmer really can produce such good results with just his hands and a hoe.
